The Editorial Committee of the Journal South Asia Research, based at South Asia Institute at SOAS, University of London created a big fuss when Emeritus Prof. Werner Menski, the journal's chief editor, wrote a lukewarm review of my book, Against Caste in British Law, in which I raise questions about the justifications given for and the potential impact of the caste legislation. Otherwise unheard of in academic practice, members of the editorial committee insisted that it could be published ...

Caste had its critics in pre-British India but a lot of these criticisms were based on the idea of "equality of all humans in the eyes of God." But in modern India, the most effective and powerful criticisms of the so-called caste-system are grounded in the notion of "equality of all citizens in the eyes of the law."

Media in both the UK and Iran have drawn a possible link between Zaghari-Ratcliffe's detention and a British debt dating back more than 40 years, to when the shah of Iran paid the UK £400 million for 1,500 Chieftain tanks. When the shah was ousted in 1979, Britain refused to deliver the tanks to the new Islamic Republic but kept the money.
